Stepping through the lobby doors of Naturally Pacific Resort, in the town of Campbell River on Vancouver Island, I came face-to-face with life-size photographs of the area's powerful landscape: the rushing waters at Myra Falls, snow-covered Mount Washington, grizzly bears hunting salmon in the Bute Inlet. These displays of wild beauty extend to the 100 rooms: textured wall coverings in blues and greens, earth-toned furnishings, and stone counters and vanities. It also has a 10,000-square-foot garden, an apiary, and an orchard, which supply the hotel's restaurant. But perhaps the most memorable feature was the option to decline housekeeping and, instead, purchase one square meter of protected rainforest in my name through the resort's partner, Wilderness International. *Accessible hotel.
